SERMON RELIGION INTIMATELY CONNECTED WITH ORDINARY LIFE.

PSALM cxvi. 9.

I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.

A N is a being of a compound nature; he confifts of a foul and a body. By the former he is allied to God and angels; by the latter to earth and earthly things. In confequence of this, he is capable of two different sorts of enjoyments, subjected to two diffinct classes of desires, and lives at once in two diffimilar states. From the body arife appetites for worldly things, and pleafure in them; from the foul, defires of things spiritual and eternal, and a relish for them. We live an animal or a natural life, and we live at the fame time a rational or spiritual life. Thus by A by the very conflictution of our nature, our attention is drawn different ways, our views are directed to contrary objects, and we are engaged in diffimilar employments. By concern about the one, we may become negligent of the other.

THE things of this world are the objects of fenfe; they are continually foliciting our notice; they force themfelves into our view; they affect us ftrongly. By these means they are very apt to render us regardless of spiritual and eternal things, which can be perceived only by faith, which make but a weak impression on the thoughtlefs, which cannot influence our conduct, except we fet ourfelves voluntarily and defignedly to meditate upon them. While we are intent on our occupations for the fupport of the animal life, we may very readily fall into neglect with respect to that occupation which belongs to us as reafonable and immortal creatures. We should guard against this with a care proportioned to the danger of our becoming guilty of it.

THE fcripture perpetually inculcates upon us, that the eternal happiness of our souls, and the practice of holiness by which it is secured, ought to be our principal concern, and to engage us more earnessly than any of the possiblesions fions and enjoyments which can profit us only in the prefent life, or any of those worldly employments which are fubfervient to the attainment of them. The least reflection is fufficient to convince us of the propriety and the importance of this conduct. To those who at all think ferioufly, the difficulty lies only in preferving a commanding impression of the neceffity of this conduct, and putting it in practice, amidst the busy scenes and the diffipations of common life. These frequently obliterate the conviction, and efface the fentiments, which are produced by the most affecting reprefentations of the superior value of spiritual and eternal things, exhibited in an hour of retirement and devotion.

It is of great moment, therefore, to acquire a ftriking fenfe of the manner in which a concern for the falvation of our fouls, and application to the duties of religion, may be intermingled with our whole worldly employment, and exerted in the various circumftances of ordinary life. For difcourfing on this fubject, we may naturally take occasion from the words now read; I will walk, fays David, before the Lord in the land of the living. To walk before the Lord , and, To walk with the Religion intimately connected SERM. I. Lord, are beautiful expressions used in scripture, on purpose to convey this very view of religion: and the former of them conveys it the more explicitly in this place, by the pfalmift's having added, in the land of the living. By these last words he no doubt defigned to express the constancy of that obedience to God, which he promised in return for the mercies acknowledged in this pfalm; he meant to intimate that he would perfift in it to the end of his life: but they likewife naturally imply, that he would incorporate his religion with his whole ordinary life, and make it to run through all the occupations in which he might ever be employed in common with other men, and to blend itself with all the transactions relative to the present world, in which he might be at any time engaged. It is certain that the fcriptures always suppose religion to be connected with common life, and defigned for influencing us in all the affairs of it: they never represent it as a thing which may be laid aside when we come into the world, or for which we have no occasion while we are bulled in the labour of our flations.

Lord,

• Gen. v. 22. 24. vi. 9. Mich. vi. 8. Mal. ii. 6.

To confider religion in this important point of view, as what ought to mix with all our fecular employments, and give a tincture and complection to all those actions which have the most intimate relation to the prefent animal life, is what I now propose.

By fetting religion in this light, I do not mean to affirm, that it contains no duties diftinct from the right conduct of our ordinary bufinefs, or that there are no exercises belonging to it, which are abstracted from common life. There are times and feations appropriated to particular religious duties, into which no concern about our ordinary bufinefs should be allowed to intrude. There are affemblies called together for partaking in the facraments, for public worship, and for hearing the word, where we must be intent on these exercises alone, and whence we muft exclude all worldly thoughts and cares. There are exercises of devotion which must be performed in the fecrefy and stillness of retirement; prayer, the reading of the fcriptures, meditation on the principles of religion and the obligations of our feveral dutics, self-examination, confession of our fins, and refolutions of amendment. We are not truly religious, if we allow concern for our temporal interefts and diligence in our worldly bufinefs to lead us into the neglect A 3 of

of thefe. They have not an immediate relation to the employments of our flations, but they are confiftent with them : they fulpend them for a little, but they can be performed without any inconvenient interruption of them. These duties of religion enter not directly into common life, nor are intimately incorporated with its functions; they are rather in appearance abstracted from them: but they are in reality fubservient to the right discharge of them. They form impressions which may influence us in life; they revive fentiments which, without them, the hurry of bufinefs would diffipate; they invigorate principles of conduct which the avocations of the world would enfeeble, but which the good man must act upon every day. Without attendance on these duties of religion, we could have no good fentiments or principles to carry into the world with us: but we attend upon them to no purpole, if we carry not into the world with us, if we maintain not amidst all the buftle of the world, the good fentiments and principles which they are fitted to infuse. The church and the clofet are the places where these duties are performed; but the world is the place where we must difplay the effects which they produce, and exert the temper of holinefs which they cherifh. The spiritual life must be recruited by the exercises of retirement

tirement and retreat: but when it is recruited by thefe, as the nourifhment adapted to it, it is in the world that it muft fhew its vigour: its functions muft mix themfoldes with all those of the animal life; our employment for eternity muft be interwoven with all our occupations for time.

In the fequel I shall, $f_{i}(\beta)$, point out the importance of this view of religion; and, fecondly, explain it.

FIRST, I shall point out the importance of confidering religion as connected with all the parts of our ordinary life.

THERE is no miftake about the nature of religion more dangerous than an opinion that it is inconfiftent, or even unconnected, with the ordinary bufinefs of life: this opinion will produce different effects on different perfons; but all the effects which it can produce, will be permicious.

IF it be entertained, it will infallibly lead the generality to neglect religion altogether. Prefent things are fo conftantly in our view, the wants and the demands of the natural life are felt fo ftrongly, that most men will be ingrofied by them, if they apprehend that, A 4 without without neglecting them, they cannot fecure future and unfeen things. Did all men perceive clearly, that they may walk with God while they are mixing in the focieties and employments of men, and that they may most effectually promote their eternal happinets while they are occupied in the businets of their temporal vocations, many would endeavour to work out their falvation *, who fearcely think of it, because they imagine it unconnected with their ordinary businets, or incompatible with their worldly purfuits.

8 Religion intimately connected SERM. I.

Some however have fo deep a fenfe of the importance of their eternal interefts, and fo ftrong a folicitude to fecure them, that an opinion of their inconfiftence with the bufinets and purfuits of life will drive them into the oppolite extreme. Under the influence of this miftake many have feeluded themfelves from the world, withdrawn from all the occupations of life, and given up themfelves to idlenets, contemplation, and folitary devotion. The life of fuch perfons may be harmlefs, but it is ufelefs: it may be freer from vice than the lives of others, but it is lefs virtuous; they have not been expoled to the fame temptations with others; their innocence has in many cafes

SERM. I. with ordinary Life. g

arifen only from their want of opportunity for committing fin, not from ftrength of mind, or the vigour of virtuous principles. Were a life of monkish indolence necessary or conducive to the improvement and falvation of our fouls, God would not have placed us in a world where we have fo many wants that cannot be fatisfied without diligent application to a variety of occupations. An active and buly life is perfectly consistent with all that God requires of us, for pleafing him or for obtaining eternal happinels. Holinels preferved uncorrupted, and exercised vigoroufly, in active life, is much worthier than the inöffensive blamelessiefs of the mere tecluse. You should yield your active service unto God. You cannot please him more effectually, than by following your feveral vocations, by engaging in the ordinary employments of life, by purfuing them with industry, and being conversant about them in a right manner. You do not serve God, you do not labour for eternity, you do not take care of your fouls, only when you are meditating, or reading, or hearing, or praying, or partaking of the Lord's fupper; but also as effectually, though these purpofes be not perhaps fo directly in your thou g ht s when you are going about your worldly bufinefs in a virtuous manner, when you are honeftly and conficientioufly doing the work of your flations. You

10 Religion intimately connected SERM. I.

You may live to God, and yet live in the world. To renounce the world and fly to folitude, is to renounce the flation which God has allotted us, and abandon the opportunities of doing good and becoming good, which he has given us.

MEN may entertain the miftake of which we are fpeaking, without running into either of the extremes now mentioned. They may regard religion as fomething wholly abstracted from life, and yet may engage in the ordinary business of life, without neglecting religion altogether. In this cafe they will take up with a false species of religion : they will be concerned, perhaps anxioufly concerned, for their falvation, but they will purfue it in an improper manner. They imagine that the state of their fouls depends only on fome formal transactions with God, on some solitary and fecret exertions of the will and the affections in dedicating themfelves to him, and accepting of Jefus Christ; and that it is no wife affected by the manner in which they carry on their ordinary business. They think that they may be religious, though they be immoral; that they may provide for eternity, though they neglect the duties of time; that they may be in a state of grace, though they be bad husbands, bad wives, unnatural parents, undutiful undutiful children, unfaithful fervants, unkind and quarrelfome neighbours, or difhonest dealers. They regard the graces of the fpirit as totally diffinct from the moral virtues; the conduct which God approves, as perfectly different from that behaviour which is useful to mankind. They make an unnatural divorce between religion and morality. In the place of true holinefs they fubftitute an abfurd and unprofitable fuperitition. Alas, my brethren, they deceive themfelves! If they act according to this idea, their religion will have no greater influence upon their conduct, than if they made no pretences to religion; and therefore it will have no more influence upon their eternal falvation. Genuine religion is wholly practical: grace is but the principle of virtue and good works. Your religion can be of no value, I should rather fay, you have no real religion, if it do not enter into life with you, if it do not pervade and animate all your actions.

A VERY great part of that conduct by which your eternal happiness may be promoted, confists in transacting your ordinary butiness in a proper and virtuous manner. There is fcarcely an action of your lives so infignificant as not either to promote or to obstruct your falvation. The most trivial and common actions may be performed right, or they may thay be performed wrong. We should all, » thetefore, maintain an uninterrupted care to perform all the actions of our lives aright. If we maintain this care, we fhall forward our everlasting happines, by the very fame actions by which we obtain or enjoy prefent things. Many of the common, actions of life are far from being trivial or unimportant in a religious and moral view. It is by living in fociety, and employing ourfelves in the ordinary bufinefs of it, that we can find opportunity for many of our most important duties, for many of the principal functions of the fpiritual and chriftian life: and by feizing these opportunities, and using them properly, we shall most effectually provide for eternity. It is from the ordinary occurrences of life, that we find occalion for the principal exertions of those virtues which tegatd either ourselves, our neighbout, or out God: and these virtues comprehend the whole of out duty, and conftitute that holinefs which is the necessary preparation for heaven.

The observations which have been hitherto made, abundantly shew the importance of that view of religion which I am endeavouring to give you; they likewise explain it in some measure: for the more particular explication of it, which was the fecond thing proposed, let SERM. I. with ordinary Life. 13 us briefly point out, how the three great branches of our duty now mentioned, interweave themfelves with the ordinary actions and employments of life.

I. THERE are many duties which we owe properly to ourselves, for practifing which we find the opportunity in the course of ordinary life.

As long as we dwell in these earthly tabernacles, fome forefight and diligence about the neceflaries and conveniences of the prefent life, is unavoidable. God doth not forbid it: he hath not made it inconfistent with the pursuit of future happines. None would with to ftarve or to be naked: God doth not require you to court these hardships. You may be diligent; you ought to be diligent in your callings : God not only allows, but commands you to be diligent; not flothful in business*, is a precept of divine authority; there are many fimilar precepts: God promites his bleffing to diligence, and gives frequent encouragement to it. That man fins, and obstructs his own progress to heaven, who is idle in his station. Religion renders industry a duty towards ourfelves, enforced by the authority of God : by reflecting

* Rom. xii. 11.

14 Religion intimately connected SERM. I. on this obligation to it, and allowing it to have fome influence upon us, we fhall convert every exertion of industry in our trade or profession into an act of obedience to God : and if, while we are prompted to industry by the inflincts and prospects of the animal life, common to all men, we be also impelled to it by a regard to the commandment of God, this additional motive cannot fail to quicken our industry, to increase it, and to render it more fuccefsful.

Gop requires that the immediate objects of your industry should not engross your whole hearts; that you should not imagine the attainment of them fufficient to make you happy; that amidst your labour for them you should maintain a fense that there are things of infinitely greater confequence, to be either obtained or loft. Religion requires you to carry thefe fentiments through life with you: they will not enfeeble your industry, they will only reftrain it from forced and unnatural exertions; they will be no hindrance to its regular and healthful motions, they will only prevent its running into difforted and convulfive agitations; they will not deftroy that eagerness which gives fpirit and perfeverance to your endeavours, they will only extinguish that anxiety, folicitude, and carefulnefs, which, while while they make you neglect eternal things, often render you at the fame time incapable of purfuing prefent things in the most effectual manner, and create immediate vexation of spirit, for which no fuccess can make amends. In a word, fuch fentiments carried through life, and acted upon, will only fanctify your industry, and render it conducive to your future happines, while it continues as subservient as ever, or even becomes more subservient to your prefent interest.

WE are so formed as to be capable of enjoyment in those earthly things which we posses. God doth not contradict our conflitution by his laws; he doth not require us to become infenfible even to the loweft pleafures. All men eat and drink : they are among the most common actions of your lives; yet religion is concerned in them. If, in eating and drinking. you are luxurious, intemperate, or debauched, you fwallow down poifon to your immortal fouls: but if you eat and drink temperately and in moderation, without overvaluing or repining for the pleafures which you have not, or abufing those which you have, avoiding fenfuality and excess; if you cat and drink in that degree which promotes the health and strength of the body, which renders it fitter for the fervice of the foul, which is decent, and and becomes a reafonable creature, made for much higher enjoyments; then you ferve God every time you eat and drink; you nourith your fouls unto eternal life, by the very fame actions by which you daily nourifh your bodies.

It is a duty which we owe to ourfelves, to preferve sobriety of mind, composure of fpirit, a freedom from all violent passions, humility, and felf-government. It is in the ordinary employments of life that we find both temptations to violate this temper, and occations for exercifing it : it is only by maintaining it amidst all the occurrences of common life, and all the calls, and vicifitudes, and tumults of bufinefs, that we can obey those divine precepts which enjoin it. You are engaged in the purfuit of fome confiderable advantage: you have now an opportunity of curbing the violence of your defires, of keeping them from poffeffing your whole fouls: this is incumbent on you, and by this you shall prepare yourfelves for that happy state which excludes every ungoverned paffion. In the course of your occupations you meet with unexpected incidents, sudden turns, perplexities, and intricacies: you are called to avoid being difcomposed by them; this will be a preparation for the fuperior regions of perfect 5

SERM. I. with ordinary Life. 17 fect ferenity and peace, at the fame time that it prevents prefent uneafinefs, and even fits you for the most proper management of your worldly businefs.

In this world, objects frequently occur which tend to draw us off from the path of life. They meet us in the fcenes of bufinefs, and in the hours of relaxation and amusement, in company, in folitude, in every fituation. Continual circumfpection and watchfulnefs against their drawing us into the ways of death, by feducing us into fin, is a duty which we owe to our own fouls: and it is a duty which we must put in practice every day, and every hour, in every place, and in every condition. We must carry this temper through life with us, we must preferve and exercise it in all the various circumftances in which at any time we stand, else we cannot persist stedfastly in the narrow way that leads to heaven.

2. In like manner, in the ordinary bufinefs of our lives we shall find the most frequent and the best opportunities of performing our feveral duties to our fellow-men. Religion requires us to embrace these opportunities : and by embracing them, and performing the duties so fuitable to them, we shall ferve God, and B please

18 Religion intimately connected SERM. I. please him, and contribute to the falvation of our own souls.

You fpend the day in merchandize, in labour, in the bufinefs of your calling whatever it is: you must carry your religion along with you; you must exercise it all the time you are thus employed. You may do your work either honefly and uprightly, or the contrary. If you deceive those with whom you have dealings, or defraud them, or injure them, you injure your own fouls much more, you move a step forward to destruction. But if in every part of your bufinels without exception, you act justly and equitably, and deal with integrity and faithfulnefs; you walk before the Lord, while you feem to be only bufy in your worldly calling; you advance in your journey towards heaven, while you feem to be only going round in the circle of employments which belong to this mortal state. The shop, the exchange, the occupations of active life, form the only theatre on which the virtues of justice, fidelity, and honesty can be practised; and without constantly practifing these, you can have no religion. These virtues tend to fecure the confidence of men, and to promote your worldly prosperity; and by the uniform practice of them, you likewife lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither math moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through, nor steal *.

In the train of life, in the intercourse of fociety and bufinefs, fome perfon does you undefigned harm, or an intended injury. This is the time when you have it in your power to exercife, and by exercifing to improve, patience, meekness, forbearance, forgiveness, kindnefs. It is only by exercifing them in fuch circumftances, by making them to run through all the actions to which fuch circumftances give occasion, that you can shew yourfelves to be the children of the Highest+, and heirs of the kingdom of life. If, on the occafions mentioned, you, on the contrary, indulge bitterness, anger, wrath, malice, revenge; if you give way to the expressions of these difpositions in the communications of company, or the connexions of bufinefs; you fhow yourfelves alienated from the gentle spirit of true religion, and you render yourfelves fit for the fociety of those fallen angels in whom malevolent paffions reign.

You go into company, you enter into conversation: the characters and the conduct of others become the topics. This is the situation in Religion intimately connected SERM. I. 20 in which you are called to make candid and favourable constructions, to vindicate aspersed innocence, to clear up misconstructed virtues, to agologize for exaggerated failings, to speak the truth in love*. You have opportunity for these duties every day : it is in the relaxations of fociety, in the turns of common converfation, that you find the opportunity; and they are effential and important duties of religion. If inftead of performing them, you, in your gayeft meetings, and most unreferved talk, defame, flander, revile, or backbite, you need make no pretentions to true religion in your closets or at church. If any man among you, lays the apostle James, scem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain +. He that bridleth not his tongue from offences to heinous as these, doth the office of Satan, and by the employment of those which he reckons his difengaged hours, and for which he thinks that little account will be required of him, entitleth himfelf to a portion with Satan.

In the course of your employments, by the events which cast up in the train of your ordinary business, you have opportunities of returning good to your benefactors, of doing

* Bph. iv. 15. † Jam. i. 26.

fervices to those who have done you evil, of fupplying the wants of the poor, by employing them, or by other means which are in your way, of fupporting the friendlefs, of producing concealed merit, or of doing fome other good office to those with whom you meet. Different employments afford different means of doing the fame good offices to others, or opportunities of doing different good offices; but every employment affords some means, and fome opportunities. It is a great part of the duty which God requires of you, to embrace and improve these opportunities : this is to do good, to be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; by this you lay up in store for yourselves a good foundation against the time to come, that you may lay hold on eternal life *.

I CANNOT mention particularly all the ways in which true holinefs will enter into focial life, and exert itself towards others, in all the varied fcenes and complicated fituations which turn up in the course of ordinary businefs. In addition to the inflances already given, I shall only observe in general, that every act of proper behaviour which we fhow as parents, as children, as maiters, as tervants, as we belong to a particular occupation or profession, as we are placed in a particular relation, is a real act of holinefs, pleafing to God, and conducive to our eternal happinels. On the other hand, every inftance of improper behaviour in any of these relations or fituations, displeases God, and retards our progrefs to heaven. When we contemplate religion as thus concerned in our whole behaviour towards others, as either observed or violated in all our focial actions, how extensive does it appear to be? how uninterrupted are our opportunities for it? how conftant should be our attention to it? how often do we neglect or transgress its obligations, when we imagine our actions perfectly indifferent, and removed wholly out of the province of religion ?

3. WE must likewise carry piety along with us through the whole course of our lives; we must exercise godlines in all our occupations: else we have no true religion, nor can be fit for the enjoyment of God. This is an important part of our subject, the illustration of which we cannot now enter upon.

SERMONIT. RELIGION INTIMATELY CONNECTED WITH ORDINARY LIFE.

PSALM cxvi. 9.

I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.

R ELIGION confidered in its just extent, contains two forts of duties, the duties of piety, and those which regard the actions of the natural and focial life. Both are effential to it. But men show a strong propensity to confider the former as unconnected with life, and the latter as unconnected with religion, and by a misconception of both forts equally, though in different respects, to disfunite religion from the occupations of common life. It proceeds from a partial view of both these; and it tends to render our practice of both defective.

MEN confine their idea of piety to the acts of immediate worfhip; they confider it not as what fhould, as what can enter into common B 4 life; life; they think that they ferve God, only when they are worfhipping him, and difengaged from their worldly employments. Conceiving religion in fo falfe and contracted a light, they neceffarily regard the actions of the natural and focial life, as without the verge of religion, as not requiring or admitting any regulation or direction from its influence.

24 Religion intimately connected SERM. IL.

In confequence of thefe partial and imperfect conceptions, fome have withdrawn from the bufinefs of life, that they might give up themfelves wholly to devotion, or have become negligent in their lawful calling, as interrupting their application to religion; and many more, intent on their worldly employments and interefts, and regarding all acts of devotion as encroaching upon thefe, neglect them totally, or croud them into as little time as poffible: God is not in all their thoughts *.

PERSONS of a ferious turn, and fenfible of the importance of piety, will apply to what they confider as belonging to it. But if they imagine acts of immediate worfhip to be all that belongs to it, their application will be of little value. They will be punctual in performing these: but they will think that when they have performed these, they have done all that piety requires, and are abundantly religious; and too often they imagine that, if they fpend fome hours of the day in devotion, they may do, through the reft of it, whatever they pleafe, whatever their vicious paffions prompt them to; at leaft they are not fufficiently careful to avoid doing fo. Thus their religion becomes a mere round of external fervices, attended perhaps with transfient and unmeaning emotions of foul, but not a preparation for the right conduct of life; and they bear in themfelves that character of corruption, which the apoftle affigns to the men of the laft days, having a form of godlinefs, but denying the power thereof *.

WHETHER men have a regard to religion, or have not, if the actions of the natural and focial life be confidered as without the province of religion, the neceffary confequence will be, that men shall think themselves at liberty to perform them, not according to the rules of religion. Whenever we look upon the ordinary actions of common life as indifferent, whenever we forget that there is either virtue or vice in almost every one of them, we are in great danger of indulging vice and contracting guilt in the performance of them. Whenever we allow ourselves to imagine that

26 Religion intimately connected SERM. II. these actions have no influence on our falvation, we shall be ready to do them in such a manner as must obstruct our falvation.

Or the three classes of duties which are incumbent upon us, those which regard ourfelves, and those which regard other men, are too often confidered as little connected with religion, and are, for that reason, reckoned fuch as may be in fome measure neglected without great danger to our falvation. I have therefore shown that our habitual behaviour, both towards ourfelves and towards others, in the various fituations of common life, necessarily implies good or evil, and promotes or obstructs our everlasting happiness. The other class of duties, those which regard God, and are comprehended under the name of piety, are, on the contrary, often confidered as unconnected with the ordinary buliness of life. In opposition to this mistake, I now proceed to show, That we must carry piety along with us through the whole course of our lives, that we must exercise godlines in all our occupations; else we can have no true religion, nor be fit for the enjoyment of God in heaven.

WE may acquire fome lively impressions of God, in retirement, or in the ordinances of worship; but if these impressions do not remain main with us and actuate us, when we enter into the world, and all the time we are converfant in the world, they are of no moment. Religious affections may be nourished in the retreats of devotion, as a child is fed within doors: but it is in the open air, and by the buffle of exercise, that the child acquires and fhows health, vigour, and agility; and it is in the field of the world, and by being introduced into its feveral occupations, that the religious affections obtain and difplay ftrength, firmnefs, and energy. It is in the world they are put to the trial, it is there we find opportunities for exerting them, and it is by being exerted there that they are improved into a commanding temper of piety.

THERE is no fituation in life, which gives not fcope for fome exercite of godlinets, and which requires it not, if we would not be wanting to our duty. Piety or a regard to God, is a vital fpirit which may run through, and ought to run through, all the virtues which refpect either ourfelves or others, to animate, to model, and direct them. It is not excluded from any place or condition which admits any virtue whatever; it cannot be difpenfed with from any fuch place or condition, but that virtue lofes much of its luftre, and is even in danger of perifhing.

Love

Religion intimately connected SERM. II. 28

Love to God is an affection which does not fpend itself in filent admiration, or warm feelings: it is fit to enter into life, and to act in life. We are commanded to KEEP ourfelves in the love of God *: it is a temper which may poffer us as confrantly, and influence us as regularly, as affection to a parent or a friend. It should influence us through life, in the whole of our behaviour, in a manner fimilar to that in which affection to a parent or a friend, operates on fuch parts of our behaviour as have a refpect to them. Love to God does not difplay itself so much, or accertain its fincerity and ardour fo unexceptionably, by any emotions inwardly felt, or by any raptures of devotion, as by its effects upon our actions; by making us delight to obey and pleafe God in every part of our behaviour; by making us willing to relinquish what we most fondly defire, or to incur what we most vehemently dread, rather than offend him in committing any fin, or neglecting any duty; by alluring us to the imitation of all those moral attributes which render God the object of our love; and by cherifhing benevolence, and drawing out beneficence to all men, who are the children of our Father in heaven. Love to God will find opportunities for fome of these exer-cifes of it, in all our worldly buinefs, in all the actions and events of common life: and if any man neglect these exercises of it, whenever he finds opportunity for them, how dwelleth the love of God in him *? His heart is void of it, though livelinets of imagination or a conftitutional warmth of affection may lead him to prefume that his love to God is ardent.

REVERENCE of God is not more analogous to the love of God, in itself, than in its effects upon our ordinary conduct. It is not exercifed only when we fet ourfelves to contemplate and celebrate his greatness: we may be, and we ought to be, in the fear of the Lord all the day long +. If we have any reverence of God, it will show itself every hour in our most common behaviour; in the shade of solitude, amidst the temptations of fociety, the cares of businefs, and the relaxation of amufements, in every fituation, it will make us to fland in awe, and not fin ‡; it will prompt us to act in a manner worthy of the prefence, the majefty, and the perfections of God.

GRATITUDE is due to God for the bleffings which we receive from him. The events of ordinary life furnish us with constant subjects of gratitude. You eat your daily food; you find yourfelves in health; you receive the price of your labour; you obtain fomething which you defired; you profper in your way: your duty in all these fituations, the apostle Paul points out, In every thing give thanks; be grateful, for this is the will of God in Chrift Jesus, concerning you *. The exercise of gratitude is not confined to profeffed acknowledgments of the mercies which we have received, in praife and thankfgiving, in private or public devotion. The world also is a field for the exercife of gratitude. It is exercifed whenever it implants in the heart a new motive to abstinence from fin and hatred of it, whenever it warms the foul with additional alacrity in doing good, and makes us take greater pleafure in it. These exercises of gratitude should be diffused through life, as much as the bleffings are, which demand our gratitude; they should influence us as often as we are engaged in any action which can imply either good or evil: and what one action of our lives does not imply them ?

COMMON life is the acknowledged fphere of refignation to the will of God. Piety exerting itfelf in refignation, is the proper root, and the only firm support of many of those duties to ourfelves, the operation of which through the occurrences of common life, either has been already delineated, or may eafily be traced; composure, for instance, amidst the tumults and fluctuations of the world, tranquillity in the uncertainty of its profpects, contentment and felf-enjoyment under its disappointments, , fortitude in the view of its dangers. If these virtues are nipt off from piety, they become puny, and wither, and die. They must be practifed through life; but they cannot be practifed except the exertions of a pious temper be twifted, as it were, with all the acts of them, to give them ftrength. All the events of life, are uncertain; we are often in adversity, our favourite designs are disappointed, our dearest comforts are taken from us, we become interested about trifles, and they fail us : we cannot perform the duties which we owe to ourselves in these seafons, without deriving aid from piety. These are the seafons which demand the practice of refignation, submission, and truft in God: thefe are the feafons in which we must put forth all our strength to retain and exercise these pious principles, else we shall fall into the fins of peevishness, difcontent, repining, murmuring, anxiety, and folicitude.

PIETY requires subjection to the authority of God, as well as fubmiffion to his providence. A fense of his authority will produce a constant difposition to obey his laws. But his laws are nothing elfe but rules for the particulars of our behaviour in all the various circumstances of human life: there is not a fituation in which we can be placed, that is without the verge of their direction; there is not a fituation in which our conduct will not be affected by our having a regard to God's fupreme authority, or by our failing in that regard.

God is not an unconcerned spectator of the behaviour of reasonable beings; he trieth their hearts, he weigheth all their actions, he approveth, or he disapproveth them. A sense of this, a prevailing respect to his judgment, a contempt of the opinions of all the world when opposed to it, is an important part of piety, and a part of it for exercifing which the state of this world gives continual opportunity. In this world, we fee vice practifed, and hear it justified; we find virtue neglected, and even turned into ridicule: the immediate pleafures and advantages of fin difguise its horrors; the the prefent uneafineffes and inconveniencies to which virtue fometimes exposes men, eclipse its beauty; corrupt fashion seems to alter the meafures of right and wrong behaviour; the promifcuous cuous distribution of outward things renders us inattentive to the opposite natures and the opposite confequences of righteousnels and iniquity. Such fituations frequently occur in the train of ordinary life; and they give opportunity for exerting a fupreme regard to the unerring judgment of God, who can fee through every difguile, who cannot be imposed upon by the most plausible pretences, whose judgment is always according to truth*. This regard is exerted when, in the whole tenour of our lives, we maintain an abhorrence of all evil, and the love of all goodnefs, and perfift invariably in avoiding the one and purfuing the other, uninfluenced by the false opinions of men, or the irregular appearances of the world, and valuing only the approbation of God.

PIETY leads us to the imitation of God: but all that is enjoined us under the idea of imitating God, confifts in the right performance of the feveral actions of common life, particularly of the focial life. It confifts in our loving our enemies, doing good to them that kate us, bleffing them that curfe us, praying for them which despitefully use us and persecute us, giving to every man that ofketh of us, and lending, causing no man to despair +. It confifts in putting away all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and 34 Religion intimately connected SERM. II. clamour, and evil-fpeaking, with all malice, and being kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, and walking in love*. It confifts in purifying ourfelves +," and being holy in all manner of converfation ‡. It is only in the courfe of our ordinary conduct, and amidft the temptations which occur in fociety, that we can have fcope for these exertions of a godlike difposition.

In a word, all the affections which belong to a temper of piety, unite their force to reftrain us from doing evil, and to excite us to do good, in all the varied fituations of common life. Every pious affection fhows itfelf by fuitable expressions in the offices of devotion; but no pious affection is completed by these immediate expressions of it: there are likewise active exertions of piety, which run through the whole of our ordinary behaviour. Every regard to God, in a manner peculiar to itself, inclines or urges us to all the duties of life, that is, to the right performance of all, even our most common actions.

DEVOUT perfons have often recommended it as highly beneficial, to mix acts of immediate worfhip, filent ejaculations of adoration, thankf-giving, prayer, confession, or repentance, with our ordinary employments; and have julily remarked that, unobferved by men, and without any interruption of thefe employments, we may find time and opportunity for them in the bufieft feenes of life, and even in the midft of our innocent amufements. This is a proper and very advantageous practice; and vet flore I unto you a more excellent way *: plety may be, and ought to be, still more intimately mixt and incorporated with our ordinary employments; they ought all to be constantly carried on under the reftraints which religion imposes, and by the principles which it inspires. To carry them on in this manner, will be to come up to the full import of the defcriptions of a life of virtue uniformly purfued under religious impressions, which the scripture gives, when it speaks of good men as setting the Lord always before them 1, ocknowledging him in all their ways +, walking before the Lord, or walking with God.

THE gospel having brought us acquainted with the Son of God, requires faith in him. Faith in Christ may be considered, either as a firm belief of what he has taught us, or as a dependence on his atonement and mediation 36 Religion intimately connected SERM. II, for our acceptance with God, notwithstanding the demerit of our fins and the imperfection of our holinefs. Confidered in both lights, faith is a principle fit to run through our whole lives, and to mix with all the most ordinary actions of them.

ALL the truths which Chrift hath taught us in the gospel, are motives to the practice of holinefs; they are constantly proposed in scripture, as incitements both to holinefs in general, and to the feveral particular virtues. The faith which the gospel requires, is not a more affent to these truths: it implies such a lively impression, and such a permanent sense of them, as may form our whole temper to holinefs, and influence all our actions. A temper of holinefs confifts in the ftrength of good affections, and in purity from vicious paffions: good affections are excited when their objects are brought into our view, and placed in a ftriking light; they are ftrengthened when their objects are brought often into view, and attentively confidered: the truths of religion fet thefe objects of good affections in the most ftriking lights, and a firm belief of the truths of religion keeps these objects constantly in our view, and fixes our attention upon them; and thus renders the good affections habitually prevalent in our hearts. It is this fame belief likewife likewife that prefents to our minds all those confiderations which tend to counteract vicious passions, and to purify us gradually from them. Every action proceeds from fome motive, without which neither would the action be done, nor that affection which is its immediate principle be fupported: every good action proceeds from some religious motive, from some truth urging us to the practice of it; it is faith that fuggests this motive, and it must suggest it in the moment in which the action is to be done. True faith keeps all the principles of religion, which can in any way influence our conduct, which can either reftrain us from doing evil or prompt us to do good, in a continual readinefs to occur to us, whenever we have occafion for them. We have occasion for them in every fituation in which we have occasion to act. Faith therefore must attend us, and fuggest the principles of religion as motives to action, in every place, and in every one of our various occupations. It must run through our whole conduct, bettowing vigour and ftability on all our virtues, purifying our hearis*, working by love +, producing good works ‡. It alone can furnish the weapons with which we may combat all the alluring profpects which fin fets before us, and all the difficulties and 38 Religion intimately connected SERM. II. gers to which virtue may expose us; and of these weapons we have need every moment; this, fays John, is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith *: to overcome the world, our faith must operate as often as we are conversant with the world. It is when faith thus exerts itself in restraining us from fin, in cheristing good affections, in exciting us to the feveral duties of life, that we may be faid to walk by faith \ddagger . The apostle Paul exhibits his own faith in this very attitude, when he fays, The life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God \ddagger .

C 3 dangers

FAITH confidered as a dependence upon Chrift, feems not to mingle fo congenially with the ordinary actions of life: yet it is truly fit to mingle with them in a very great degree. Whenever we reflect that we have committed any fin, and feel remorfe for it, (and, in the prefent frail ftate of man, how often must this happen to every fensible heart?) it is faith exerting itself in dependence upon Chrift, that mitigates our forrow, and reftores our chearfulnes. Whenever we are confcious of a good action, when the confcious of it gives us good hope ||, it is by truft in Jefus Chrift that this hope is supported, and pre-

ferved from finking beneath the fense of our imperfection and guilt. It is dependence upon Chrift, that encourages us to amend what we know to be wrong in ourfelves, and in our former conduct; for it is dependence upon him, that makes us to feel that it shall not be in vain: and while we are imperfect creatures, a great part of right conduct must consist in endeavours to do the feveral actions of life better than we have done them in former inflances. In general, hopes and fears of futurity not only arife in the hours of reflection, but often influence us in the actions of life; and in a Chriftian, hope and fear can never be wholly feparated from exercises of faith towards Jefus, who delivereth us from the verath to come *, and through whom eternal life is the gift of God to us +.

THE gofpel reveals to us the Holy Spirit alfo, and requires us to exercise dependence on the affiftance which he is fent on purpose to impart. To be convinced that this dependence should run through our whole lives, and mingle with all our actions, and to understand how it may do so, we need only recollect the end for which the affistance of the Spirit is given. It is given for our fanctification; it is given to be a principle of purity, and virtue, and activity in well-doing. Through the whole course of our life, and in all its occupations, we have opportunities of avoiding evil and of doing good; and whenever we exert ourfelves in either, it should be with dependence on the aids of the Divine Spirit. We should have an habitual truft in these, similar to that habitual fense which good men entertain of the dependence of their nature and all their powers upon God. If we have fuch truft, it will lead us, not only to recognife, at flated times, the Holy Spirit as the author of our virtues, and to pray to God for his aids; but alfo to look up to him in the very moment of action, and, by the confcioufnefs of the prefence and fupport of fo powerful an affiftant, to invigorate ourfelves in every hour of languor, and to encourage ourfelves in every moment of temptation and difficulty, that we may, without weariness or intermission, put forth all the Arength which he imparts to us, in refifting all the attacks of fin, and practifing every virtue, as we find the opportunity. It is this habitual and active improvement of the divine aids, that the apostle recommends to the Galatians; This I fay then, Walk in the Spirit *: the expression implies, that we should have the whole tenour of our ordinary behaviour regulated by the influence of the Spirit of God.

• Gal. v. 16.

THUS I have endeavoured to represent religion to you, in its connexion with ordinary life. I have shown the importance of this view of it; and I have explained it, by pointing out the opportunities which ordinary life affords for the practice of religion, and by tracing the influence of religion on our behaviour in these several opportunities. Religion confifts not in our withdrawing from the occupations of the prefent world, but in our being conversant in them after a virtuous manner. The apostle Paul, in defcribing that goodnefs which the gofpel was revealed on purpofe to enforce, reduces it to the three heads of virtue which we have now illustrated, that we live foberly, righteoufly, and godly, and he adds, in this prefent world *: the addition is not vain, it fuggefts the very idea which I have made it my bufinefs to unfold; it intimates that we have no religion, no Chriftianity, if we do not carry it into the world with us, and exercise it in all the circumstances of life. The apostle James gives us the fame view of religion, though in a different manner of expretion; Pure religion and undefiled before God even the Father, is this, To vifit the fatherlefs and the widow in their affliction, and to keep bimfelf unspotted from the world +: the world

• Tit. ii. 12. † Jam. i. 27.

contains temptations to vice, and it prefents opportunities of doing good in all the ways of virtuous exertion; both occur at all times and in all conditions; and pure religion confifts in guarding against the former, and embracing and improving the latter, whenever they occur. When our Saviour was most folicitous for the happiness of his disciples; when he had the most immediate view of the dangers to which they were exposed in a world that hated them, as it had before hated him *, when he declared that they were not of the world +; even then he faid to his Father, I pray not that thou should stake them out of the revorld, but that thou shoulds keep them from the evil ‡. It was by being fent forth into the world, and acting in it, that they could be ufeful, and that they could become happy.

THE example of our Saviour, as well as the intimations of fcripture, fets religion in this point of view. Through all the early part of his life, he laboured in Jofeph's vocation, as a carpenter : he left it not till the feafon came when he was called to enter on another vocation, inconfiftent with it, and which required all his time. Even after that, he ftill lived in the world, mixed in fociety,

* John xvii. 14. † Ver. 16. ‡ Ver. 15.

conversed with men, was in all points tempted like as we are *; and in this fit sation continued to be without fin +, exhibited an example of every virtue in perfection, and by that example shewed mankind, in what manner religion should exert itielf in the feveral occurrences of common life. It is for the fame purpole, that the lives and actions of good men are recorded in feripture; it is to let us fee, how they exercised their religion in the fcenes of action and in fecular employment: and the wifdom of God, by delivering a great part of the scripture in the form of hillory, has provided for recording to great a number and variety of examples, that in them we may observe the operation of religion in almost every possible condition and juncture of human life. If you be not religious and virtuous in active life, in whatever flation you fill, in whatever occupation you follow, it is your own fault, not the fault of your fituation: religion and virtue may be incorporated: with the bufinefs of every lawful calling; thefe have actually been incorporated together in the practice of many of your fellow-men. The spirit of true religion, and the spirit of worldly bufinefs, are not repugnant, like a drop of water and a drop of oil, which repel each other, and refufe to mingle; they may be rendered like two drops of mercury, which run together and form one drop. The improvement and happiness of our sould is most effectually promoted when all our worldly occupations are rendered subservient to it : our present interests will likewise be best secured when all our endeavours after them are regulated by religion and virtue.

• Gal. ii. 20. † Heb. iv. 16.

WHEN the boundaries between religion and ordinary life are misplaced, both must be unduly contracted. They are not like two territories feparated by a precise limit, but like territories which, befides the parts that lie in this manner diffinct, have many fields in common, or connected by mutual fervitudes, fo that they can be cultivated and improved only by united efforts. It is fometimes faid, that God has referved the Lord's day for himfelf and his fervice, and that he has given us the other fix days of the week for ourfelves. This manner of speaking is inaccurate, and has too much a tendency to difguife the connexion between religion and common life. The Lord's day, God has in some sense referved peculiarly to himfelf; on it we ought to abstain from our worldly occupations : but its exercises are not unrelated to these occupations, they are defigned to prepare us for the right and virtuous management of them, and should be performed with this view. The other fix days. God has allowed us for our worldly occupations; but not exclusively of ferving him: for in thefe very occupations we ought to ferve God every hour of all the fix days. We do ferve him in them, whenever we carry them on in a virtuous manner. By thus carrying them on, we promote our falvation, though we should not at all times explicitly intend to promote it by them. But it will render our worldly occupations the more fublervient to our falvation, for it will contribute to our practifing them aright, that throughout the whole courfe of them we preferve a folicitude for our falvation, and frequently exert actual defires of promoting it by means of the labours of our station. Thus shall we be possessed of an habitual good intention; thus shall we apply a good intention to our most indifferent actions, and direct them all to laudable and worthy ends.

SOME have apologized for the multiplication of ceremonies in religion, by afferting that this multiplies the opportunities of ferving God, and the means of promoting our falvation. The apology is frivolous : the obfervance of ceremonies is neither ferving God nor a means of our falvation, except the cere-2 monies

Religion intimately connected SERM. II. 46 monics be of divine appointment; and if they were, yet still the multiplication of ceremonies, would multiply our dangers of neglecting his will and falling into fin, would increate the difficulty of religion, would render many things neceffary which might have been fafely omitted if God had not required them by politive precepts, and would thus prove a fnare to our fouls. But the ordinary actions of life muft neceffarily be done : and by fetting ourfelves to do them all with a regard to God, and with a view to the improvement and falvation of our fouls, we fhall, without incurring any new danger or inconvenience, multiply the means of our falvation, increase the number of our virtues, and avoid many vices: we shall render our whole existence one continued act of goodnefs, religion, and obedience; and we shall be, in all the fituations and occurrences of life, pleafing to him whom we are made to pleafe, and in pleafing whom our happiness confists.

To conclude, we are at prefent in a flate of difcipline for eternity: every event, every circumftance of this flate gives us opportunity for the practice of fome virtue; and it is by acting virtuoufly in every circumftance of this flate, that we can be improved in holinefs, and become fit for heaven. Our commoneft actions

SERM. II. with ordinary Life. 47 tions are those in which we think religion leaft concerned, and on which we are apt to beftow the leaft attention : but of our commonest actions we ought rather to take the greatest care ; for they are most frequently repeated ; they will therefore form the strongest habits ; they will most promote our improvement and our happines, if they be constantly performed right ; but they will most obstruct it, if we indulge ourfelves in a custom of performing them wrong.
