THE THEORIES OF MODERN PHILOSOPHY IN RELIGION, GOVERNMENT AND MORALS, CONTRASTED WITH THE PRACTICAL SYSTEM OF NEW-ENGLAND.

AN ORATION.

THERE are few propensities of the human mind which folicit indulgence fo fuccessfully, as those which prompt us to commemorate the anniversaries of illustrious events, and to eulogise those by whom they were atchieved.

WE return with mournful pleafure to feafons of darknels, and kneel with gratitude, over the tombs of those who have bled for their country. The recollection of the events which impelled them to action, transports us back to the periods, and conveys us to the places in which they fought. We linger with flrong emotions, on the ground which has been wet with the blood of our friends; we mark the fpot which was once a fcene of carnage, and furvey, again and again, the ramparts of war now covered with verdure. Our feelings of joy for the fuccefs of our country are almost fwallowed up in the ftrong fympathy which we experience for the fufferings and death of fome diffinguished individual. Hence the place where WARREN fell will be pointed out to the latest posterity.

HOWEVER grateful it might be to our feelings to recapitulate the dangers through which we have paffed, and to celebrate the affertors of our independence, we forbear to refume a theme which has been already exhausted, and to tear open the wounds which time has closed. While we drop a tear over those heroes who fell in the storm of war; remember with gratitude those whom the course of nature has fince called to the grave, and survey with reverence the worthies who still remain, we yield to the crifis of the times, and pass from the recapitulation of dangers which are gonc to the contemplation of those which are present.

THE interruption of domestic happiness, the exhauftion of public and private wealth, and the immenfe facrifice of lives by which our revolution was accomplished, were esteemed a cheap price for the preservation of our ancient privileges, and for the affurance of future fecurity. For a confiderable period, our union in private life and energy in council feemed to laugh to fcorn the predictions of our enemies; while a progress, almost unparalleled, in wealth, reputation and numbers, rendered lefs improbable the chimerical visions of poets and the dreams of enthusiastic patriots. A NEW ERA in human things was faid to be commenced, and the ardent lovers of mankind anticipated, with fanguine confidence, the return of the golden age, and the commencement of a glorious millennium.

SUCH were the prospects which brightened upon the world just before the evening of the eighteenth century. Who could have thought that the fun, which had burst from the clouds with so much glory, was fo foon to set in blood!

A NEW CRA in human things is now indeed commenced.

THAT bold and impious philosophy, which proraifes the total regeneration of mankind; which has fummoned to its banners the millions of Europe, and founded the charge to univerfal carnage, has commenced, in this country, the initiatory work of public corruption, and daily renews its labors, with a zeal not to be damped, and a fuccefs which mocks ail opposition.

Ar fuch a period the crifes of the times, naturally prefcribes to the orator of the day, the fubject of difcuffion.

In feafons of common tranquillity, novelty alone might charm and ingenuity arreft the attention; but there are periods when a fenfe of danger renders futile every effort to amufe, and the mind is fatisfied, only with a ferious and impressive representation, of the impending ruin, and of the means of escape.

WE are called upon by this philosophy, to abandon every principle which we have learned, every habit which has been fanctioned by experience, and every inflitution which we have derived from our fathers.

To accomplifh this work of facrilegious devastation, a degree of zeal is exerted worthy of a better caufe, and while the fuccefs by which it is attended, on the one hand, infpires new confidence, on the other, it excites alarm and doubtful apprehension. Few even of those most actively engaged, are apprifed of the real tendency of the principles which they advocate, and the fatal effect of the measures they purfue. In many inftances, honeft in their views, but deluded by fuperior art, they miftake demagogues for patriots, and devallation for reform ; while they continue to accumulate forrow and guilt for themfelves, and ruin for the land which gave them birth. Like the ox, whofe labor helps to rear the altar on which himfelf is to bleed, they are made the victims of their own credulity, and the humble inftruments of their own deftruction. But the CHAMPIONS of the new philosophy, fully appri6 ied of the nature of their doctrines, and the effect of their exertions, move forward in this impious enterprife, with a sullen intrepidity, which fears no obstacle and starts at no consequence.

SOMETIMES arrogant, bold and commanding, they awe the timid into acquiefcence, and with the impofing appearance of talents and dignity, command the homage of the undifcerning; at other times, perfuafive, modelt and alluring, they steal upon the heart by the smoothness of adulation, and delude the mind by glowing pictures of future happiness and glory. Addressing themselves to the fears, the ambition, the envy, the avarice, and, universally, to the weakness and corruption of mankind, they find the heart prepared to yield before the understanding is convinced, and the hand is stretched forth to destroy, even before the victim is known.

THE impulse thus received, is communicated, by fympathy, to increasing numbers, until the multitude, stimulated to madness against those whom they deem their oppress, and blindly devoted to their self-styled friends, demand the victims of their fury, with an importunity not to be denied.

BEFORE we yield to a delusion thus complete, and an impulse thus uncontrolable; let us examine, with fevere forutiny, the doctrines which we are folicited to believe, and the practices which we are urged to adopt; and let us compare the enjoyments which are promised us, with our real bleffings and fubstantial happiness.

FOR, the contemplated change, when once accomplished will be final:

" Facilis descensus averni

Sed revocare gradum, fuperafque evadere ad auras Hoc opus, hic labor est."

The descent to ruin is easy, but to retrace our steps and reach again the light of heaven, is indeed difficult and laborious.

This projected reform is not confined to a few important particulars, but embraces every human intereft, from the chair of fupreme magiftracy to the cottage fire-fide. Unconnected with any fystem of faith and politics, it wages war against every government and every religion. Society itself is to stand upon a new basis; government, religion and every focial institution are to be abolished, and men are to become immortal by the mere omnipotence of mind over matter.

SUCH is the abstract jargon of this new philosophy. Contemptible as it may appear in the eyes of rational men, it has done more, within a given period, to destroy the happiness of mankind, than the arms of conquerors, or the ravages of the pestilence.

LET us therefore delineate its features, and then compare it with the good, old, practical SYSTEM OF NEW-ENGLAND. Thus, by viewing the two pictures together, we shall be able to decide which is beautiful, in the correct proportions of nature, and the modest simplicity of religion, and which is distorted in its form, and daubed, like Jezebel of old, with false deceptive coloring.

THE great code of "improved modern ethics," morality and legislation" where the doctrines of the new school are drawn out into system, and gravely assume the name of philosophy, is GODWIN'S "Political Justice." Were not this work of Mr. Godwin* the BIBLE of modern reformers; were not

* MR. GODWIN. It may perhaps feem fuperfluous to add any thing to the remarks which have been made by different writers upon this author. In England, he has been hunted down by the united his impious, abfurd and abominable dogmas daily taught in our ftreets, and preached on the houfe tops, an apology might well be demanded for introducing him again to the public attention. But when our ALL is at ftake we must have "time upon line, and precept upon precept." We are bound to use all the arms, which are furnished by argument and ridicule, to fcout such men from fociety and drive them into obscurity and contempt. In this production will be found most of the principles here commented upon, while the rest will be drawn from ephemeral writings, and the colloquial rant of modern philosophy.

THE efforts of this philosophy are directed principally against RELIGION and GOVERNMENT, and as a principal mean in overthrowing these, it strikes at the EDUCATION, HABITS and MORALS of private life. In no point do its disciples agree more univerfally, than in their enmity to the CHRISTIAN RE-powers of reasoning and ridicule. The writer of the "Purfuits of Literature," in particular, with great keennefs of wit, and force of ridicule, has exposed the impious theories and miferable weakness of this REPUBLICAN PHILOSOPHER.-But it is necessary that fimilar efforts should be made in this country alfo. Godwin is read and admired, by all that clafs of citizens who arrogate to themselves the title of REPUBLI-CAN. How far they merit this appellation, may bell be learned from the bumility, MODERATION and difinterestedness by which their leaders are fo much diffinguished. The principles of Godwin's " Political Juffice," if carried into full effect in this country, would make the UNITED STATES, what FRANCE has been; a NATION OF RAVISHERS, ASSASSING and PREDATORY wARRIORS. It is therefore a facred duty to expose his miferable dogmas to that contempt which they deferve. It is not difficult to conceive why bad men should be his advocates. But it is really more than even charity can do to acquit both the heads and the hearts of Mr. Godwin's difciples. They are at liberty to take their choice of either part of the alternative. As a fine writer, Mr. Godwin's pretensions ought never to be mentioned. He is obscure, diffule and frigid; dull, form J and abstract.

AN ORATION.

LIGION, and to the dominion of him who bled on CALVARY. For, it is totally hoftile to that pride of intellect, and impatience of control, by which they are uniformly characterized, and the doctrines which it inculcates are directly opposed to most of their favorite tenets. Hence, the destruction of Christianity is an object of primary importance, for it stands in the very vestibule of modern improvement, armed with the two-edged fword of THE AL-MICHTT.

THE bible is faid to exhibit a falle picture of the human character. In the language of philosophism: Man is not naturally depraved, but innocent.' Inclined to virtue, and warm in the purfuit of'knowledge, religion and focial inftitutions have ferved only to corrupt his primeval innocence, and to cramp the energies of his intellect. Left to himtelf, he would inftinctively foar to the brighteft regions of virtue and the most glorious heights of understanding. Nay, perpetually progressing in the endless career of perfectibility, he would eventually fupercede the necessity of fleep; fubdue the dominion of passion, and, by the mere energy of mind, baffle the attack of every difease, and triumph over the KING OF TERRORS. Not only does the bible give a falle account of the powers of the human mind, and the propensities of the human heart, but the virtues which it inculcates are faid to be mean and felfish. It commands its disciples to do good to those who are within their reach; to relieve the diffreffed wanderer in the ftreets, and vifit the prifoner in his dungeon; and not merely to fay " be ye warmed and filled," but to perform the deed of charity, and leave the event to heaven.

BUT modern philanthropilts feel no particular attachments, and exercise no particular benevolence. With " a certain cold-blooded indifference to all the mild, pious and honorable feelings of our common B 10 nature," they fpurn the mifery which lies imploring at their feet, but glow with philanthropy to future generations. Extending their views to diftant worlds and fystems, they overlook " this little spot which men call earth." Their benevolence is exhausted upon beings who do not exist; they burn to relieve those who are confcious of no oppression; and long to bound over oceans, and to traverse continents, in fearch of fusserings unredressed, and injuries unavenged. They weep over a dying als, but shout at the decapitation of a king. The implicit submission of the Turk, and the apathy of the Chinese, call forth a flood of tears, while the bleeding trunks around the guillotinc, the solution of ravaged countries, and the carnage of flaughtered armies, awaken a horrid joy at the progrefs of liberty.

AFFECTION for our parents, brothers, fifters and friends, is proferibed by Mr. Godwin as the refult of prejudice, and an offence to the principles of juftice. The true cosinopolite feels no gratitude, for he has no attachments. He prefers " no human being to another becaufe that being is his father, wife or son, but because for reasons which equally apply to all understandings that being is entitled to preference." Thus a theoretical candor, a cold calculation of merit, is to expel from the breast every tender and amiable feeling. Those to whom we owe our being, our education, and the feeds of every virtue, must be abandoned to want, discase and death, while a visionary philanthropy impels us to feck objects of fancicd worth, whom we never have feen, and to whom we owe no obligation. The feriptural account of rewards and punishments is hooted at by Mr. Godwin and the whole band of demoralizing fophifts. The former directly prefers the liberal gods of pagan theology; those pliant deities, whose morality could give no offence to the most easy voluptuary, and whose mysterious rites enjoined no mortifying penance upon human propenfities.

WELL may we suppose that the corruptors of the universe, the affaffins of human virtue and happiness, would with to escape the scrutiny of him whose eyes are "as a flame of fire," and the retributions of those torments "whose smoke ascendeth forever and ever."

A FAR different remuneration is proposed by them to perfevering virtue; in the good opinion of a world, whose shouts of applause are often bestowed upon successful villany; while the hiss of contempt and the pointed singer of scorn are the reward of inflexible rectitude.

But if the code of modern philosophy were harmless in other respects, Mr. Godwin, in his chapter upon promises, has dispatched all moral obligation at a fingle flroke. Hear his own words • "I have promised to bestow a fum of money upon some good and respectable purpose. In the interval between the promise and my fulfilling it, a greater and nobler purpose offers itself, and calls with an imperious voice for my co-operation. Which ought I to prefer? That which best deserves my preference. A promise con make no alteration in the case. I ought to be guided by the intrinsic merit of the objects, and not by any external and foreign confideration. No engagements of mine can change their intrinsic claims."

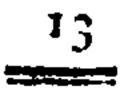

This is, unqueflionably, a very convenient mode of paying a debt; nor need we wonder that cofmopolites are very partial to fuch morality when it frees them, at once, from the impertinence of fheriffs, and the tyranny of courts of juffice. It is peculiarly convenient for those generalizing philosophers, whose time is for much devoted to the care of the universe, that they have none left to bestow on the fordid employments of industry, and the felfish avocations of family good. But in a serious view how execrable is fuch a teacher of morality—how contemptible fuch a philosopher ! These are " thy Gods, O Israel !"

SUICIDE is justified by this writer. He would think it rather unphilosophical to destroy one's own life merely to avoid some personal evil. But if the general good demands such a measure, it is the highest instance of disintercited heroism. If the general good, a phantom before which all particular bappines vanishes, requires that an innocent man, known to be such, should be tortured, the torture must be inflicted. Thus the good of the whole consists in the misery of the parts, and the felicity of the universe is consistent with the wretchedness of every individual which it contains.

BUT an evil, refulting from religion, which excites the most lively solicitude in the breasts of these gentlemen, is, that it maintains an order of men, who, in this country, possessed of the slenderest means of support---remote from the scenes of ambition, and wholly engrossed in doing good to mankind, are still described as plotting the most nefarious defigns against the state, and burning with lust of power and hatred to liberty. Enemies to the gods of modern philosophy, they pay no worship at their shrines, and offer no incense on their altars. Hostile to that total dereliction of principle, which assumes the name of liberality of sentiment; to that boastful philanthropy, which flows from the most exclusive felfishnes; and to that raging love of liberty, which springs only from a perfect impatience of control; they affert with firmness the principles which they believe; inculcate that love of mankind which is confiftent with affection for our friends and our country, and advocate that rational liberty which is allied to firmnefs, energy and order. Hence their days are numbered by the genius of reform, and the hand-writing on the wall has already marked them out for destruction. As preparatory to a confummation so devoutly to be wished, their characters must be covered with infamy; the protection of fociety withdrawn; all contracts and laws for their fupport annulled, and, if contempt and poverty cannot fink them to the grave, they must then be offered up to appeale the incenfed deity of revolutions.

Thus religion must be discarded, its altars and temples thrown down, its ministers driven from fociety, or configned to the executioner, and all fense of moral obligation banished from the breast, before mankind can enjoy the bleffings of that equality, which fecks only the level of defolation, the dismal independence of the grave ! " Be astonished O ye heavens at this, and" thou, O earth, " be horribly afraid !"

IT was not to be expected that men who thus defy the omnipotence of heaven, thould feel any foruples in laying violent hands upon GOVERNMENT. But confidering mankind as not yet ripe for that confummation of philosophical reform, which is to fweep every inftitution, literary, civil and religious, from the face of the world, they are contented for the prefent, to impair the energy of government by little and little ; thus inducing a gradual decline which muft finally end in diffolution.

THEIR first position is that all nations are capable of enjoying liberty. The brutism of the Hottentot, and the prejudices of the Hindu form no obstacle to this favorite theory. Virtue and information are not necessary to the existence of rational freedom ; licentious fields is liberty ; and rapine and murder are among the rights of man. Confcious that all good men will oppose their destrince, no arts are too low no sycophancy is too abject to fecure the applause of the populace, that they may marshal them in hostility, against the wealth, the dignity and the virtue of society. Hence that fenseles jargon which proclaims the will of the people as paramount to all laws,
